He re-viewed at some length the unsavory record of the democratic parts on the questions of secession, slaver, and finance. It was not a question of honoring a worthy general, but of of honoring a worthy general, but of giving the country the kind of a president it needs. He pointed out that an army officer who had no previous trailing as a statesman was at a said disadvantage in handling the affairs of state, a craft in which he was wholly or even partially unskilled; that he would become frequently has illusted, often act wrongly, at bewildered, often act wrongly, get discouraged or reskless, and do in-comparable injury to government,
